
From:
Sent: Tuesday, 10 March 2015 12:16 PM
To: redress
Subject: Exoneration from child abuse allegations

Dear Child abuse royal commission,

Could you please keep e informed as to the avenues open to the public when a wrong and damaging allegation is made against a person of child abuse and the prejudices against genuine child molesters is cast upon persons of demonstrated good repute by the Judicial and police institutions?

I am in the process of writing my paper as a humanities graduate to ensure judges, police and other institutions refrain from passing judgments on people with demonstrated good repute on the basis of single instances of contact with child pornography by prejudicial community attitudes toward anyone studying, working or dealing with the sensitive nature of child abuse.

In other words, how can good people be protected from wrong and damaging life changing allegations of child abuse when the persons can demonstrate to be of exceptional good repute yet the prejudices of police and judges outweighs the good nature and intent of persons working with children for many years and not a single complaint by a child or anyone has ever been made against that persons good repute.

My book advocates the importance of protection and educating children, however, there is a darker side to the equation which is resulting in the injustices of our prejudices and the royal commission should consider the facts that police and judges often act and judge with personal interests of promotion and prejudices which will ruin good peoples lives...etc.

Thanking you,

Alex Jimenez BA
Writer